ADAPTIVE SPORTS

Aide Betsy Fraker works with a delighted Kendall Hill, 5, as she rides a bicycle modified for children with disabilities Friday at Navin Elementary in Marysville. [BROOKE LAVALLEY/DISPATCH]

A little rush of freedom

Modified bikes thrill kids with disabilities

By Holly Zachariah
The Columbus Dispatch

MARYSVILLE — Kendall Hill, 5 years old and wearing her finest sparkly rainbow-colored tennis shoes and a bright red helmet, climbed into the front seat of the bulky tandem bicycle and giggled as a volunteer strapped her in.

The kindergartner crinkled up her face in serious concentration as she tried to push the pedals to get the specially adapted bike to go. It was a bit intimidating, so Kendall ever so subtly and without a sound reached behind her and grabbed the hand of Betsy Fraker, her aide at Navin Elementary School in Marysville. Together, the two pedaled their way around the gymnasium, offering Kendall a new kind of fun and freedom from the “driver’s” seat.

Medical use of marijuana faces federal obstacle

By Marty Schladen
The Columbus Dispatch

A cloud is looming over Ohio and every other state with a medical marijuana system.

A little-known federal budget amendment that protects growers, processors, sellers and the professionals who work with them might expire this year at the behest of the Trump administration.

Now known as the

Controversial Rover pipeline nears an end

By Marion Renault
The Columbus Dispatch

In the first 10 months of its construction, the $4.2 billion, 713-mile Rover interstate natural-gas pipeline has drawn more attention than most.

In Ohio, it has racked up more than 20 environmental violations and been the target of lawsuits by rural landowners and the state’s attorney general.
